tional Guard. He made many legal citations to support his contention that under the Constitution Congress has no power to enforce the discipline it has authority to prescribe. Should any state refuse to appoint officers or to train national guardsmen, he said, Congress would be without any recourse. It could neither provide for the training of the guardsmen itself nor compel the state to act, and it could not empower the President to appoint officers or compel the state to appoint them.

Disagrees With Mr. Borah.

Senator Cummins of Iowa and Senaor Lewis of Illinois sharply disagreed with Senator Borah. Senator Lewis atacked the Senate bill provision for a tacked the Senate bill provision for a force of federal volunteers, saying it was aimed at the National Guard and would destroy it if enacted. The Illinois senator asserted that the ambition of regular army officers to rise to deserved promotions was wholly responsible for the volunteer army proposal. Because the nation was resolved not to maintain a large standing. not to maintain a large standing army, and since the Constitution barred these graduates of West Point from commands in the National Guard, he said, they naturally sought an avenue of escape from their limitations.

Senator Brandegee of Connecticut added to the amendments now pendpeace strength of the army 250,000 instead of 180,000 as proposed in the bill. as an amendment his bill proposing that a military training course be provided for any high school with an attendance of more than fifty boys above sixteen years of age, the government to pay two-fifths of the salary of a military instructor. More than 100,000 boys could be brought under training in this way, he said.
